Bad Treatment of Irishmen.

During the Fenian raid, J. C. Breckinridge and full Senate consists of twenty-five, and a full House scripts and rebels -offered their services to the Casion. They received the thanks of the authorities for their offer, but their services were declined .-Now where will we find an instance of more baseless ingratitude than this offer of John C.'s, to fight his old friends the Fenians?

No sooner have the Irish emigrants been naturalized, than they have gravitated into the Demothis result would have been reached at once but for cratic party with unerring precision. An Irishman is proverbial for seeing things "tother end to;" and though he left Ireland to escape oppression, on arstaunch member of the Democratic party, an organization the very antipodes of the party of free-

Throughout the whole of his political career, the BOOT Irish vote was polled for Breckinridge with a steadiness and regularity that seemed the impulse of fate. He owed his election to the Vice Presidency in 156 to the Irish vote. In 1860 the Milesians divided their affections between Breckinridge and Douglas, but after the death of the latter the bulk of the wandering ones went back to their first love. Throughout the war J. C.'s Irish friends maintained an undivided allegiance for him and his cause; for there is no disguising the fact that during the war the bulk of the Irish vote was cast for the Copperhead ticket, and the sympathies of that party are only too well known.

Thus we see that Breckinridge's Fenian friends stuck to him "through thick and thin," "through evil and good report;" but John, the ungrateful scamp, as soon as an opportunity was offered for serving his old friends, "lifted up his heel against" them. The Fenians themselves seem at last to have comprehended that they have been in the wrong boat all the time, and they are now talking about transferring themselves from John's old pirate craft Secession, and taking permanent passage on the good ship Union. We should think that it was time they comprehended the ungratefulness of their leaders, and realized that, with all their avowed hatred of oppression, they have all along been training with the party opposed to freedom and Union.

In the year 1846, the writer embarked in the Drug Busi ness in the city of Philadelphia, and while thusengaged, made several experiments in regard to the most desirable mode of preparing Fluid Extracts. My efforts being successful-the erticles being approved and used by the Medical Faculty-I was d strous of placing them before the public, but hesitated for some time before concluding to resert to newspaper advertising, knowing the prejudices that existed in the minds of many against using advortised Medicines or Nucleums, but through the advice of friends and those who had used them
